By Yvonna Lincoln

In her groundbreaking book, The Constructivist Credo, Yvonna Lincoln challenges traditional notions of reality and knowledge. Lincoln argues that our understanding of the world is not objective, but rather is constructed through our own experiences and interactions with others. This book is essential reading for anyone interested in understanding the nature of reality and knowledge.

Lincoln begins by arguing that there is no such thing as an objective reality. Instead, she argues that our understanding of the world is always mediated by our own experiences and perceptions. This means that what we see as real is not necessarily real in itself, but rather is a product of our own minds.

Lincoln then goes on to discuss the implications of this view for our understanding of knowledge. She argues that knowledge is not something that we can simply discover, but rather something that we must construct for ourselves. This means that there is no such thing as absolute knowledge, but rather only our own subjective understandings of the world.

Lincoln's constructivist credo has profound implications for our understanding of the world. It challenges the traditional view that we can simply discover the truth about the world, and instead suggests that our knowledge is always limited by our own experiences and perspectives. This is a revolutionary idea that has the potential to change the way we think about ourselves and our place in the world.
