Doe defines theological liberalism as "a commitment to the principles of freedom of conscience, religious pluralism, and the separation of church and state." He argues that these principles are essential to the Church's mission in the modern world, and that they offer the best way to respond to the challenges of secularism and globalization.

On the other hand, Doe defines anti-Catholicism as "a prejudice or hostility towards the Catholic Church." He argues that anti-Catholicism is a growing force in the world today, and that it is a threat to the Church's mission. Doe identifies several factors that have contributed to the rise of anti-Catholicism, including the sexual abuse scandal, the Church's opposition to same-sex marriage, and the perceived authoritarianism of Pope Francis.

Doe argues that the Church must respond to the challenges of anti-Catholicism by embracing theological liberalism. He believes that the Church must show that it is a force for good in the world, and that it is committed to the principles of freedom and equality. Doe also believes that the Church must engage in dialogue with its critics, and that it must be willing to listen to their concerns.

Thoughts On Anti Catholicism And Theological Liberalism is a timely and important book. It offers a unique perspective on the ongoing debate between traditionalists and progressives in the Catholic Church, and it provides a compelling argument for theological liberalism. The book is a must-read for anyone interested in understanding the modern Catholic Church.
